The WOMAN

A Novel by Albert Payson Terhune

Founded on William C. de Mille's Play of the same name

Copyright 1913, The Robert-Merrill Co., by Special Arrangement with the J. M. Loe Publishing Co.

"Oh, be sensible!" urged Robertson; and Tom, who knew his brother-in-law, noted the mighty effort with which the attempt at conciliation was kept up. "We're both politicians. There's no sense in spouting noble sentiments for my benefit. Keep them for your patrons. I was promised the speaker's ship. And to get it away from me you turn me out. The Mullins bill—tonight's battle—means nothing to you but a test of power. There's no principle involved. If you can kill the bill—it will prove only you're strong enough to dispose our speaker and put yourself in his chair. That's your game. Why pose as a reformer?"

"You're quite wrong," said Standish, with a certain irritating patience. "I haven't any pose. If I had I should not bother to display it for your benefit. I am not hypocrite enough to say I don't want every legitimate political reward I can earn. Who doesn't? But that's not why I'm fighting this Mullins bill of yours. And at heart you know it isn't. I'm trying to kill this bill because it is an offense to the country's nostrils. The bill is innocent enough on its face. Van Dyke and the rest saw to that, I suppose. But when I looked at it more closely I saw it was framed to legalize the over-capitalization of every railroad in the United States and to make what little good
